

Celebrate Being a Hunter

Being a hunter is something to be proud of. We aren't superior to the vast majority of farmers out there. After all, without farming we would not have modern society. Hunters are just different. We have always been a small minority of the population. Just because most folks have forgotten their traditional dependence on hunters doesn't mean that it has ended.

Think about it. There are roughly 180 million working adults in the United States. There are approximately 9 million small business owners with between 2 and 500 employees. Even if small business provides only 40% of total employment, it means 72 million workers are dependent on the hunters for their job. If you include families, that extrapolates to at least 125 million people who need small business owners for their survival, or an average of 14 people for every entrepreneur.

Every business owner is acutely aware of the employees, spouses, children, and other dependents that rely on his or her decisions for their welfare. That sense of responsibility weighs heavily.

Some people seem to believe that entrepreneurs are lucky to have employees and that they should be required by law to do more for them at every opportunity. They have forgotten one of the oldest truths in human society: Hunters can farm, but farmers can't hunt.
